Tap anywhere to move on. The space bar works too. The arrow at the bottom left takes you back, and going back is never a failure.

One card at a time

A page gives your eyes a hundred places to land. A card has edges, and never ends mid-sentence.

The clock, top left

That is a reading sprint counting down. Twenty minutes, with a visible end and a proper break after it. Tap it to pause.

The three buttons beside it

Cards, Flow, Pace. Flow keeps the text flowing and dims everything but your spot. Pace shows one word at a time, and stops at three hundred and fifty words a minute, which is where comprehension stops holding.

The list button, top right

Chapters. Open it and jump to any part of this guide. There is a box at the bottom for going to a page by the number printed on it.

The AA beside it

Everything about how this looks. Text size, spacing, line width, themes, how much goes on a card.

Each setting says whether there is evidence behind it. Some say there is none, and stay off.

Where you are in this stretch, and the dots show what is left. Small numbers, on purpose. Four of eleven is finishable.

At the end of a stretch

You will be asked, in one line, what you just read. Answer it in your head. If nothing comes, that is the useful part, and there is a button to read it again.

Your place is kept

Close the app mid-sentence and come back on Thursday. It reopens on that card, and steps back one so you land inside the thought.

Nothing leaves this device.
